Sourcetype in relation to styling of content is inconsistent I'm editing an existing site and I need to update the format of some content on the site. I started this project by adding a custom source type for the content in question. In my local dev environment it works great - I can edit the source and the style gets updated for the new format. However, when I check it out to production there is a problem. The source for the old format is still the custom source type, but all the style elements have changed. This is obviously a problem - I can't update the format without breaking the existing style. Is this a configuration issue, or am I missing a step somewhere? A: The answer ended up being due to a slightly different issue, but in order to accurately diagnose this would have required me to create a new issue with all of the relevant details. It was way out on my part to tackle the issue without detailed information. I ended up making the following changes: Added a custom (reusable) widget for the reason that no other widgets or templates seemed to be capable of formatting the content properly. Installed the widget and stored a custom template in the widget module. Added the custom source type Set the source of the new content type to the new template. Everything works great now and as expected. Q: XSD file send tester I'm searching a make tool that can help me for testing an existing XSD file or to generate an new XSD file. I want to generate an XSD file from WSDL file and send that data via a SOAP message. Thanks A: Data
