A 14 mg dose was able to increase blood flow to the brain while decreasing CSF production \[@CR32]. In another study, the reported maximum dosage of GABA was 35 mg \[@CR33], and another study examined the ability of GABA to dilate cerebral arterioles in a dose dependent fashion, with a reported maximum of 9.25 mg \[@CR34]. Taken together, it is likely that the ability of GABA to increase cerebral blood flow in humans is in the high milligram per kilogram range. Our finding that GABA increases cerebral blood flow and decreases CSF production is inconsistent with the notion that cerebrospinal fluid production is regulated by brain vascular resistance. If cerebral blood flow is increased as a result of GABA, then we might expect that blood flow would increase in cerebral arterioles, thereby decreasing their resistance, and cerebral blood flow would therefore decrease as a result of increased cerebrospinal fluid production. Instead, we found that despite increasing cerebral blood flow, GABA actually increased CSF production. The size of the cerebral circulation and the capacity of the CSF system may be determined by a balance between the metabolic demand of the brain and the flow-related mechanical effects of cerebral blood flow \[[@CR23]\]. The report of Brahimí et al. \[[@CR23]\] suggests that their increase in brain metabolic activity that
