Years after a plague kills most of humanity and turns the rest into monsters, New York City's lone survivor valiantly fights for a cure. However, he will have to go through a series of deadly trials and become the person who will ultimately stop the ominous epidemic. Richard Linklater Plague CHAPTER FIRST PROLOGUE It was winter, the days were getting shorter, and when the sun touched the horizon it was almost as cold as winter in Siberia. Sarah Becker was looking at the northeast part of the city. She shivered all over and trembled. It was terrible to see that the ruined and nameless metro station, which some time ago she considered her home, lay in ruined piles of rubble, from which metal beams stick out and from which, like the remains of the walls of some collapsed building, fragments of collapsed ceilings stick out. When Sarah finally realized that no one else would be waiting for her here, she was seized with mortal fear. Gaius, her eldest son, was still out there somewhere, and it was too late to look for him. Actually it was too late. She tried to force herself to calm down, but the damned trembling wouldn't go away. Sarah sighed, glanced around quickly, and immediately felt this detached piece of the roof fall on her head, almost at eye level. Her family lived on Sixth Avenue, at the very beginning of Fifth Street. It was a great area, spacious, green and quiet. She and her husband wanted their children to grow up without needing anything, and therefore they built a cozy wooden house in which they always had many guests. But after Guy appeared in their family, everything did not go the way they wanted. Did he really need them that much? She did not know. Hearing the sound of her son, she straightened up. Her husband was at home, but none of them wanted to talk. And she had to sit silently, listening to the crackle of the fire and the tramp of quick steps along the pavement in the street. Then she heard his name, and at first she did not understand who exactly was calling, and therefore did not immediately understand when her husband was calling her, and then she realized that her own son was calling her. There were so many reasons for shame and hatred, but these were not the feelings she was used to. She looked at the battered and smoky wreckage that had once been her home and sighed heavily.
