What's New in the?

Page Speed Tester is a compact tool that may come in handy for Website owners that need to keep an eye on the speed in which their content is being circulated. The app's sole purpose is to calculate the download speed for the target page and offer feedback about the estimated average values. For somehow accurate test results the number of loads has to start from three so average values can be reached. The maximum number of loads is not implied, but two or three digits can be used, for more accurate predictions. The interface sports two main panes, and several smaller fields for URL input and speed times display. The first pane is loading the front page code only, as the content would be too much to handle if tens or hundreds or loads were to be selected. Regarding the results, the speed values are shown under two different forms the actual time in milliseconds (ms) and in bytes. There is also a third measurement, the BpS (bytes per second) which kind of combines the first two. In conclusion, Page Speed tester could be a useful tool for users that own or manage website and need to test the average download speeds from their pages. The overall process is simple enough so that anybody can master it in a couple of minutes. We've noticed that you are using an ad-blocker. This is making us obsolete.
