OptiSystem 16.Recent Articles Apartment rental site Yardi has released its own HTML5 software that can detect errors in landlord data such as an apartment's square footage, room count, and number of bedrooms. For landlords and property managers who must clean up their listings once they've been submitted to Yardi, each field in each apartment can be edited and updated. While property can only be updated once, it can be edited several times. Even if a landlord is not looking to go to Yardi, the website allows landlords to change any number of data fields and check them against the original data in Yardi's database. The tool can check data fields and detect errors for over 3,000 different fields. To check a field, a landlord simply fills out a form for the field with the appropriate data. The field will be checked against the original Yardi database to confirm that the landlord's data is accurate. Yardi was founded by Leslie Goulder in 2008, who had previously founded and sold an online software company. Goulder told PCMag that the Yardi name actually refers to his co-founder, Jon Mandel. “We had a crappy discussion about the name before we decided to use
