One can only reflect sadly and doubt seriously on the fate of the beautiful but flawed old nation which some have called "the torch-bearer of freedom". A great Republic has to hold its own flame a little longer. Any more light and it would be extinguished. The bourgeoisie of the U.S.A. is today an organization of big business which has discovered that its future cannot be secured by the maintenance of a democratic government for its citizenry. The ruling class of U.S.A. appears to have realized long ago that it is becoming impotent and that it is necessary to dismantle the power of the working class as quickly as possible before it is possible for this class to organize a revolutionary movement to demand its rights. This development, which has begun in America, can hardly be confined to that country. It is a logical outcome of the general processes which have been at work throughout Europe since the middle of the nineteenth century. This process culminated in the great economic crisis of 1929, which is still affecting and suffering countries all over the world. This crisis shook the whole social and economic structure of Europe and created a new situation for the working class. The trade union movement, the working class parties and the parties of the bourgeoisie, were divided. Some of them were outraged by the crisis, like the Socialists, who tried to protect their political power by reactionary means. Others, like the Christian-Democrats, were in favour of a new alliance with the big bourgeoisies and therefore with the reactionaries. These parties of the middle class saw their future in the immediate interest of the bourgeoisie. The more they acted in this way the more they undermin

Internal Revenue Service has begun criminal investigations into the tax-exempt status of non-profit organisations with a political agenda, in the latest stage of a major crackdown on political activity by the agency. Individuals and political groups operating without tax-exempt status have been a major focus of the IRS's efforts. However, with the existing federal ban on political activity by tax-exempt bodies, the IRS is facing the challenge of acting against the activities of political groups as if they were for-profit corporations rather than a non-profit organisation. With a new criminal offence carrying a possible prison sentence of five years, such groups and individuals could face criminal charges if they have misled the IRS about their political activities. The new measure also bars such organisations from receiving any government grant. The IRS has already investigated the tax-exempt status of non-profit organisations that actively campaigned against the president's healthcare plan and is considering cases in which groups have encouraged non-members to vote in elections, said the sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the new programme had not yet been announced. A senior IRS official said the agency "will take appropriate action" against any individuals or groups that mislead the IRS about their political activities. Last month, the House of Representatives' investigative committee reported that the IRS had inappropriately targeted conservative groups for extra scrutiny, and that it had received over 1m applications for tax-exempt status since 2010. A White House official said the IRS
